Around the time of the 1920 census, Georgia's mean center of population began moving in a north-north-westerly direction from a point just north of Macon towards the eastern area of the Atlanta Regional Commission. As of the present 2010 census, the center of population is located near the juncture of Butts, Newton, and Jasper counties. Prior to 1910, the center of population was moving in the opposite direction.